The project is based on value chain approach. Apart from building linkages between actors along value chains it is entirely market-driven and it is offering technical assistance to disseminate innovative agricultural practices and technologies and build capacities through customized training to which women are a target.

Since then it has helped more than 1.2 million people, including both refugees and vulnerable members of host communities, who also feel the impact of the crisis. Its work in Lebanon includes providing cash transfers and food vouchers, as well as World Food Programme e-cards, so more than 550,000 refugees can buy the essential items they need. To help provide children with a place to relax, play and learn, they have run Child Friendly Spaces and other activities for some 4,000 children, as well as opened adolescent friendly spaces where young people from different backgrounds can spend time and get to know each other. In areas where refugees are living, it has also made improvements to water and sanitation systems. With the escalation of the conflict in 2012, World Vision expanded its response efforts into Jordan and Syria during 2013
